Over Mother's Day weekend, my wife and I flew back to New York City for our granddaughter's college graduation. That was my first time to visit New York City. As someone who has grown up and lived much of my life in rural and small towns (in the upper mid-west) until more recent years in Omaha, I was somewhat overwhelmed with how easy it could be to especially feel insignificant in such a highly populated area as NYC. Unfortunately, some people can feel that way even in smaller towns and cities. It is important to not base our identity and significance on how prominent we are in the world or even in our community. Rather, it is important that we believe that God knows and cares about us each one and that we have a group of people where we have significant and supportive relationships, whether it is your own family, a church family, a group of friends or co-workers. Find your significance in your Creator and in some of the special people He brings into your life.
