Do you like interruptions? If we have busy lives and schedules, interruptions easily lead to frustrations. I just recently experienced my second bout with Covid (thankfully just a mild case). For someone who is used to being out and away from home probably six out of seven days every week, being stuck at home for ten days straight was at times frustrating, especially when I was feeling OK. But interruptions and frustrations can be helpful in teaching us patience, in helping us be more compassionate towards others who are going through or living with similar circumstances, and in helping us do some self-examination about our priorities. So here's hoping that we are each learning from our interruptions and frustrations!
